GIN

PLYMOUTH

A style unto itself.

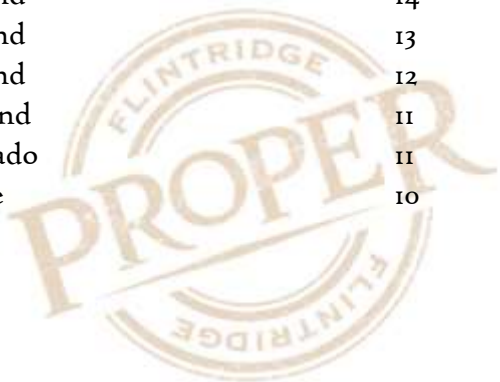

Plymouth Gin can only be produced in the city of Plymouth, England by one company and was called for by name in the first published recipe for a “Dry Martini” in 1896. Plymouth Gin is notably less “juniper-y” than London Dry and has a soft, earthy flavor.

NEW WORLD

This modern style of gin is characterized by downplaying juniper and showcasing less traditional and uncommon botanicals. New World gins have the most expansive range of flavor profiles, and tends to be lighter and more smooth than its London Dry style counterpart.

OLD TOM

While it is produced with the same range of botanicals as London Dry, the Old Tom style has an added dosage of sugar (or, more traditionally, orange flower water) that makes it sweeter and less forward.

It was most popular during the mid-1800s but a small number of dedicated distillers are resurrecting it for use in classic cocktail recipes from that era.

GIN

SLOE AND FLAVORED GINS

Gin liqueurs that are made by macerating fruit in sweetened gin which are traditionally made and consumed during the winter months.

Though sloe berries are the most common choice, other fruit, such as raspberries or Damson plums, can also be used.

SCOTCH

Scotch is a type of whiskey made only in Scotland, though each area of Scotland produces its own unique style. Scotch whiskey can be made from malted or unmalted barley and grains, but must be aged a minimum of 3 years and smoked with peat fires to carry the name. Depending on its region of origin and base ingredients it can be anywhere from light, floral and sweet to heavy, briny and herbal.

BOURBON

Bourbon, the official spirit of the United States, is a whiskey made primarily from corn, rye and wheat. It is aged in new, charred American oak barrels that impart a distinct sweetness and vanilla tones. Though Bourbon can be made anywhere in the contiguous 48 states, only those from Bourbon County, KY have the right to be labeled Kentucky Straight Bourbon Whiskey.

CANADIAN

Canadian Whiskey is made from the same mix of corn, rye and wheat as American Bourbon, but differences in production method and aging tend to result in a lighter, smoother whiskey.

It rose to prominence during American Prohibition when Canadian distillers increased production and turned a blind eye to smuggling across the border.

RUM

Rum was first made in the islands of the Caribbean from molasses, the byproduct of the refining of fresh sugar cane but can also be made from pure sugar cane juice. Spanish style rums are light, fruity and generally unaged. English style rums are heavy, funky, and benefit from extended aging. French style rums are made from pure sugar cane juice and take on intense herbal and vegetal qualities.

TEQUILA

Tequila must be made from the juice of the Weber Blue Agave and can only in select parts of Mexico. Those from the Highlands are floral and lighter in body. Those from the Lowlands are notably more earthy and full. Blancos can be aged no more than 2 months, if at all. Reposados are aged from 2 months to one year. And Anejos must be aged a minimum of one year, but no more than three.
